This book and the research project on which it was based would not have been possible without the support and guidance of teachers, friends, and interlocutors in New York and Warsaw over several years.

I would like to thank the members of my dissertation committee, which changed in the course of completing this project. My advisor, Ann Stoler, has been a formative influence from the start and a source of support at moments of doubt. Janet Roitman, Miriam Ticktin, Bruce Grant, and Rayna Rapp all taught and inspired me in their graduate seminars, reading groups, informal conversations, and comments on different parts of the draft. Elżbieta Matynia, who first brought me to The New School, remained, with her intimate familiarity with both American and Polish politics and societies, a generous reader and commentator. Early on, Adriana Petryna introduced me to many of the questions that would continue to guide and motivate my work on this project. I would also like to acknowledge the role and influence of other scholars I have been lucky to have as teachers and whose thinking, I would like to believe, has left a trace in my own attempts to understand and account for the social worlds I experienced in the field, especially Hylton White, Emily Martin, Katherine Verdery, and Mick Taussig.

My fieldwork would not have been possible without the generosity and guidance of many interlocutors and friends in Warsaw. I owe a tremendous thank you to Maciej Myszka, Ludwik Bryła, and Łukasz Świącicki, as well as Iwona Koszewska, although there were many others who offered their time, shared their expertise, and often welcomed me into the daily practice of their work. My project was generously funded by the Wenner-Gren Foundation for Anthropological Research and the David Bruderer Stiftung. I am very grateful to the Bruderer family for their support.

Finally, of the many friends and colleagues at home who assisted me in completing this project, I want to mention two. Vasiliki Touhouliotis, whose commitment and courage continue to keep my faith in anthropology as not just an academic, but also an ethical and political discipline, was an unwavering source of support. Her generosity and intellectual companionship were crucial to making this dissertation materialize. In the final stretch of the write-up, Katie Detwiler's brilliance and intellectual as well as editorial discipline were invaluable.

Lastly, I want to thank my family for their support and patience—over a time and distance much greater than they would have liked.

I am fortunate to be able to claim the inspiration and support of all the persons mentioned above—and so many others—but the responsibility for any shortcomings of this work is mine entirely.
